TechSmith Camtasia Studio 9.0.4 Build 1948 Serial [2021]

we need to now move up to the more difficult case of russia and the other former soviet union countries. and those countries are really at the threshold of where the big investment decisions are going to be made. russia, georgia, ukraine, belarus, kazakhstan, have really large populations, but really not much existing electricity production, not much existing electricity consumption. those countries really can be the largest producers of natural gas that the world has ever seen in the coming decades, and really what you are seeing now is an opportunity for those countries to move off the technology that they have now and move to the technology that is on the market today. and so on-boarding of that technology really, really matters. you are right. in some of these countries its gone pretty well, and you know, it wasn't a coordinated approach, but its a systematic approach to these governments and to these coal facilities. the case of argentina, which i think has really the most well documented history of this, was a well-orchestrated approach, and i think we all expected that the government owned utility would use the existing tariffs that it had and would be fully on board, but as we all know, they got off track, they got into the sort of political corruption and really corruption plagued the entire system. so that was the lack of coordination. in russia and the other countries we are now looking at, it's a little bit different. there is the willingness to move forward, there are the direct foreign investment pipelines, it's the track record that is very real, and the access to that technology, its not a question of if you can get it, its a question of when, and is its going to happen through formal trade agreements. so far we havent seen a lot of that, but it is there.
